'Refact but on the variety and extent of his acquirements; he stands acound to no man, either as a historian or as a bibliographer and when I regard him as a popular essaviet (for the airt les of his composition in the civices are for the greater part essays on subjects of deep or curious interest, rather than criticems on particular works) I look in vain for any writer who has conveyed so much information, going so many and recendits accures with so many just and original reficctions, in a style so lively and poignant, vet so uniformly classical and perspicuous no one, in short who has combined so much wisdom with so much with so much with so much with a much in make the process of composition known before, and he has added new once, and, if we except the highest lyric, (in which how few, how very few, even of the greatest minds, have been fortunate!) he has attempted elective the greatest minds, have been fortunate!) he has attempted even; species successfully. It is Souther's almost un exampled islicity to poscess the best gifts of talent and genius, free from all their characteristic defects. SOUTHEY THE PORT.

'Joan of Arc' is an English and French in Poesus of magnitude, the different characters, customs and manners of antions. 'Joan of Arc' is an English and French atory; 'Phalish,' Arabins;' Kahama,' Indien;' Maloc,' Websh and American; and 'Roderick,' Spanish and Moorish: no resuld it be seep to say, texting saide the first, which was a very youthful by the work of the work of the work of the control of the work of the work of the work of the control of the wildest, and sometimes are negative, the wildest, and sometimes even extravagant, imaginings, that shall preserve them forwer from oblivion, embalming them in the spirit of delight and of love."—Provisson Witson: Recrustions of Christopher North: An How's Tutk about Phetry.

A later very suninent critic is incredulous as respects the non-oblivion;

"His poems, taken in the mass, stand far higher than his prose works. The Lauresto Oles, Indeed, among which the Vision of Judgment must be classed, are, for the most part, worse than Pyés, and as had as Cibber's; nor do we think him generally happy in short pieces. But his longer poems, though this of finitis, are nevertheless very extraordinary productions. We doubt whatever,"—Loop Maccutar: Retin. Rev., Jan. 1830, 530, (Sastley's Colloques on Nociety's) and in his Essays.

Souther the Prose WRITER.

"His prose is perfect. Of his poetry there are various opinions; there is, perhaps, too much for the present generation; posterity will probably select. He has passages equal to any thing. At present the has a party, but no public,—except for his prose writeings. The Life of Nelson is beautiful,—Loan Brack: Journal, Nov. 22, 1813: Moore's Byron, i.

"Mr. Southey's prose style can scarcely be too much praised, It is plain, clear, pointed, familiar, perfectly modern in its tex ture, but with a grave and sparkling admixture of archains in its ornaments and occasional phraseology. He is the best and most natural prose writer of any poet of the day: we mean that he is far better than Lord Byron, Mr. Wordsworth, or Mr. Colerdge, for instance."—WILLIAN HARLITT: Spirit of the Age: (Mr. Southey.)

Parscorr, the historiam: N. Amer. Rev. July, 1832, 193, (English Literature of the Ninsteenth Century.) "In vigour and variety of genins Robert Southey has few equals. "He had not the patience of research and calmness of judgment indispensable for a trustworthy historian. His facts in many places will not bear investigation; be was oredulous in the extreme, and gravely retailed statements on the authority of inflamed chronicles which subsequent inquiry disproved and common sense at the moment might at once have discovered to be false."—Sir Archibald Alison: Hist. of Europe, 1815-1852,

The next testimony to be adduced is that of a witness who knew Southey well; and it will be observed that it is highly creditable to the latter, both as an author and as a man:

litignly oreditable to the latter, both as an author and as a man:

"Reflect but on the variety and extent of his acquirements; he stands second to no man, either as a historian or as a hibliographer; and when I regard him as a popular essays to for the articles of his composition in the reviews are for the greater part essays on analysects of deep or curious interest, rather than criticisms on particular works) I look in vain for any writer who has conveyed so much information, som so many and recondite sonrees, with so many just and original reflections, in a style so lively and poignant, yet so unformly classical and perspicuous: no one, in short, who has combined so much wisdom with so much wit, so much truth and knowledge with so much life and funcy. His prose is always intelligible, and always entertaining. In poetry he has attempted simest every species of composition known before, and he has added now one; and, if we except the highest lyric, (in which how few, how very few, even of the greatest minds, have been fortunated) he has attempted every species successfully. It is Souther's almost un exampled felicity to possess the best gifts of talent and genius, free from all their characteristic defects. As son, brother, hasband, father, master, friend, he moves with firm yet light steps, lacke unostentatious and silke exemplary. As writer, he has unformly made his talents subservient to the best interests of humsnity, of public virtue, and domestic plety; his cause has ever been the cause of pure religion and of liberty, of national independence and of national filumination."—Samuzz Tatton Colkentons: Hoggraphia Literaria, ch. iii.

"An English worthy, doing his duty for fifty poble years of labour, day by day by dry working for scant wages, most charitable out of his small means, bravely fightful to the calling which he had chosen, refusing to turn from his path for popular praise or prince's favour; —I mean Robert Smalley. We have left his old political landmarks miles and miles belind; we protest against his dogmatien; may, we begin to forget it and his politics; but I hope his life will not be forgetton, for it is sublime in its simplicity, les energy, its honour, its affection! In the campat between Time and Thanks. I suspect the former destroyer has conspected; Kebama's crise frightens very few readers now; but Southey's private lattere are worth piles of epics, and are worte to last among us as long as hind hearts like to sympathies with goodness and purising and love and upright life. —TRAGERMAR: George the Trivial.

we have thus fully recorded
"I wilked out with Woldsworth We met with Dr Arneld
We talked of Southey Woldsworth spoke of him with great feeling and affection. He said, 'It is painful to see how completely dead Southey is become to all but books. He is annuable and obliging, but when he gets away from his books he seems resiless, and as if out of his observed. I therefore hardly ace him for years together.' Now, all this I hid myself observed Rogers also had notice it. With Woodsworth it was a suiject of sorrow, not of reproach. Dr Arneld said alterwards, 'What was said of Vi. Southey alarmed me. I could not help saying to mixelf, "Am I in danger of becoming like him? Shall I ever lose my interest in things, and tetaln an interest in books only?" to miscif, "Am I in danger of becoming like him? Shall I ver lose my interest in things, and teatin an interest in books only?" If, said Wordsworth, 'I must lose my interest in one of them, I would rather give up books than men—Indeed, I am by my eyne compelled, in a great measure, to give up reading? Yet, with all this, Southey was an affectionate husband, and is a fond father—I find that his distasts for London is as atrong searly as his dislike to Paris—He says he does not wish to see it again "—H C Robinson's Durry, &c., ed Bost, 1870, it, 274.

Sparks, Jared, LL.D., b. about 1794, at Willington, Connecticut, in early life and under discouraging circumstances evinced that love of study and aptness in the acquisition of knowledge which in later years produced fruits truly honourable to himself and eminently beneficial to the world.

"On a late visit to Mansfield, Connecticut," remarks a traveller, "we formed a pleasant acquaintance with an old gentleman named Holt, formerly a school-tracker, who numbered among his pupils no loss a personage than Jared Sparks, the distinguished biographer and historian. Mr. Holt related to us a number of anecdotes and incidents of 'Jared,' as he termed his fonoured pupil. He said 'Jared was an uncommonly fine boy,' and would learn more in one week than his other scholars would learn in three or four weeks. 'One night,' said he, 'at the dismissal of the school, I told Jared to remain with me after the others had gone. He did so, and, looking up to me with an inquiring glance, said, 'Master, what have I done?' Done? too much for me!' said the school-master. At this Jared became embarrassed, and legged an axplanation. The good-man then told him that he was getting too learned for his master, and recommended him to enter a higher institution. But the youth did not consent, and begged to remain a while longer."

Referring, for the particulars of his enterprising and successful career, to the authority to which we are indebted for the preceding anecdote, (National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans, edit. 1854,) we present a brief biographical summary by stating that, after surmounting no ordinary difficulties, he graduated at Harvard College in 1815, subsequently taught for one year a private classical school at Laucaster, Massachusetts, and then returned to Harvard, to study divinity chiefly under the instruction of the Rev. Dr. Ware, at that time Hollis Professor; acted as editor of the North American Review, May, 1817, to March, 1818, inclusive; was ordained pastor of a new Unitarian church at Baltimore, Maryland, May, 1819, (see Channing, William Eller, D.D.,) and resigned this post in consequence of failure of health, April, 1823; Chaplain to the House of Representatives at Washington, 1821; was the originator and chief writer of the Unitarian Miscellany and Christian Monitor, published by him at Baltimore for two years, (1821-23.) and afterwards continued for two more by Dr. F. W. P. Greenwood; sole proprietor and editor of the North American Review, January, 1824, to April, 1830, inclusive; McLean Professor of Ancient and Modern History at Harvard, 1838 to 1849, and President of the College, 1849 to February, 1853, when he resigned on account of ill health. The Corporation received "with great regret the letter of resignation," assuring him of their conviction "that the present prosperous condition of the college is, to a large extent, the result of the bigh tone of your influence and example, of the wisdom of the measures you have devised, and the extent of the reputation your character and attainments have secured. "Testimonials of the same gratifying have secured." Testimonials of the same gratifying character were also received from the Faculty, being the board of immediate instruction and discipline, and the Raculty of the Law School.

Faculty of the Law School.

After his resignation Dr. Sparks resided in retirement of Cambridge, devoting his studious hours to the preparation of A History of the American Revolution, to obtain ariginal materials for which he visited Europe in 1858. This he did not live to see published: he died at Cambridge, March 14, 1866. Chronological list of his publications: 1. Letters on the Ministry, Ritual, and Doctrines of the Protestant Episcopal Church; addressed to the Rev. William E. Wyatt, D.D., in reply to a Sermon, Balt., 1820, See; 2d ed., Boat., 1844, 12mo. Dr. Miller, of Princeton, Bost., 1823, 8vo. Enlarged from the originals in The Unitarius Miscellany.

"Dr. Miller had published a sermon at Baltimore, which entained some remarks on Unitariate, that were thought to be unreasonably severs and unjust. Mr. Sparks made semisargues tures on the sermon; Dr. Miller replied; and out of the ountroversy sprang these Letters, the most cluboruts and thoughful of the writer's thoological productions."—National Portrath-College. "It is well known that Franklin prepared so much of the celebrated Menoirs of his life as was originally intended for publication, mainly at the solicitation of one of his most cherished friends in France.—M. Le Veillard, then Mayor of Pasy. Toward the close of the year 1789 he presented to this gentleman a copy of all this sketch that was then finished. At the Doctor's death, his papers, including the original of the manuscript, passed into the hands of one of his grandeous, William Temple Franklin, who undertook to prepare an edition of the life and writings of his grandfather for a publishing house in London.

"For the greater convenience of the printer in the preparation of this edition.—so goes the tradition in the Veillard family.—William Temple Franklin exchanged the original autograph with Mrs. Le Veillard, then a widow, for her copy of the Memoirs, and thus the autograph passed out of the Franklin family.

"At the death of the widow Le Veillard, this manuscript passed to her daughter; and at her death, in 1834, it became the property of her cousin, M. de Senarmont, whose grandson, M. P. de Senarmont, transferred it to me on the 26th of January, 1867, with several other memorials of Franklin, which had descended to him with the manuscript. Among the latter were the famous pastel portrait of Franklin by Duplessie, which he precented to M. Le Veillard from Dr. Franklin, and from his grandsons, William Temple Franklin, and Benjamin Franklin Hache; together with a minute Outline of the topics of his Memoirs, prought down to the termination of the topics of his Memoirs, prought down to the termination of the suited myself of my earliest leisure to subject the Memoirs to a careful collation with the edition which had appeared in London in 1813, and which was the first and only edition; that ever purported to have been printed from the simulatoript. 15. Correspondence of the American Revolution; being Letters of Eminent Men to George Washington from the Time of his taking Command of the Army to the End of his Presidency; Edited from the Original Manuscripts, 1853, 8vo; l. p., r. 8vo. These volumes contain a selection of about 1000 letters (from about 190 writers) from several thousands not used in the Notes and Appendix to the Writings of Washington, (No. 10, supra.) Of course the two collections must stand side by side on the shelf of the American historical library; and such should be in every American family at least. A review of No. 15 will be found in N. Amer. Rev., July, 1853,

80-105. The critic (J. G. Palfrey) assures us that "The volumes are prepared with the good judgment, good taste, and careful illustration which the public looks for in whatever passes through the hands of Mr. Sparks,"

Dr. Sparks also edited Professor Smyth's Lectures on Modern History, (see SMYTH, WILLIAM, No. 2,) and contributed (1817-62) fifty-two articles to the North American Review.

Spearman, Robert, of Oldacres, Northumberland, has been already referred to in our notice of his theological master: see Hutchinson, John. Of his own he published: 1. An Enquiry after Philosophy and Theology, Edin., 1755, (some 1756,) 8vo; 2d ed., Dubl., 1757, 8vo. 2. Letters to a Friend concerning the Septuagint Translation and the Heathen Mythology, Edin., 1759, 8vo.

"Both these works contain a respectable portion of genius and learning, but are sfrongly tinctured with the principles and spirit of the school to which the author belonged. Spearman's opinion of the Septuagint was low and incorrect; but he has some sensible remarks on the quotations from it in the New Testament. He considers all the mythology of the heathen to have been originally derived from Revelation."—Orne's Bill. Bib., 416.

Malone's edition contains only a selection; Singer's is called the authentic edition of the original; and his 2d edition is "reprinted verbatim from his former edition." (are his Proface to ed. of 1859;) but, remarks the critic of the Athenseum, after a notice of some of the unremoved difficulties of his text,

"Enough has been proved to show that, instead of a 'verbatim' reprint, what was wanted was a carefully revised, collated, and amounts de edition, and that Mr. Singer's, neat and cifesp, unhappily 'stops the way."

"As I knew Mr. Joseph Spence, I do not think I should have been so much delighted as Dr. Kippis with reading his letters. He was a good-natured, harmless little soul, but more like a silver penny than a genius. It was a neat, fiddle-faddle bit of sterling, that had read good books and kept good company, but was too trifling for use, and only fit to please a child."—Horace Walpole to Rev. W. "To the Editor of The Pull Mall Gusette, [1866:]

"En: The paragraph which you lately published, on the authority of the American papers, 'that Prof. Youmans recently left that country in order to present to Mr. Herbert Spencer $5000 and a very valuable gold watch as a testimonial from his American admirers,' requires some correction, as it misstates both the amount contributed and my own purpose in coming to this country. The case is this, Nearly all Mr. Spencer's writings have been republished in America, where they have been both widely read and very highly approclated.

"Many of his friends there, feeling a deep indebtedness to him for works by which they knew he had been the loser to a serious amount, thought that they could not more suitably express their gratitude than by a substantial testimonial. But knowing that Mr. Spencer had decisively declined some overtures on the part of his friends in England, having the kindred purpose of preventing the cessation of his philosophical series, and preferring not to be placed in a like predicament, they invested 7000 dollars in his name in public securities, which, as they belong to no one else, he is of course at liberty either to appropriate or leave to accumulate for the benefit of his heirs.

"This admirable book, though it is confined to an ilfustration of the Ritual Law, yet it is by far the most considerable attempt yet made to explain the nature and genius of the Mosaic religion. It is for infinite use, not only for its appropriate excellence, but for the subjects, necessarily leading him to a very detailed account of the Ancient Pagan World, without which knowledge we can have but a very imporfect idea of the Jewish Law and History."—Bishop Warnuston.

takes Warburton to task.

"It [Spencer De Legibus, &c.] is a very learned but a very dangerous work; the great object of which is to show that the Hebrew ritual was almost entirely borrowed from the Egyptlans, and accommodated to the taste and prejudices which the Jews had acquired among that people. The same hypothesis had been stated by Maimonides, a philosophizing Jew, in his More Norochm, and was greedily laid hold of by Sir John Marsham in his Canga Chronicos Aegyptlacus. A masterly refutation of the work of Spencer was furnished by Witsius, in his Aegyptlacus; and Shucklord, in his Connections, supplies also many argaments on the same side."—Onne; Bibl. Bib., 217.

Dr. Woodward, in his Discourse on the Worship of the Egyptians, (see Woodward, John, M.D., No. 8,) and William Jones of Nayland, in his Considerations of the Reli-Dam Jones of Nayland, in his Constuerances of the meir-gious Worship of the Heathens, 1799, (see Jones's Works, zii.,) also attack Spencer; on whose behalf, on the other side, it has been alleged that "his chief purpose was to prove in detail that the rites and coremonies of the Jewish religion were instituted in direct opposition to the prac-tices of the surrounding identrous nations, and in criber to establish the attraceast distinction between the Jewis to establish the strongest distinction between the Jews and them." Sir John Marsham, it will be remembered, (p. 1229, supra,) was attacked and defended on the subset.

"He [Spanoer] preparterously deduced the rites of the Hebre from the rites of the Heathens, and so produced a work The tope most preparationary acquired use rives of the Machine from the ribes of the Heathers, and so produced a wirk of learned appearance and composed in elegant Latin, but disgraded in Christian Divinity, dishonorable to the Church of Bugland, and affording a very bad example to win scholars who should succeed him."—Joyes of NAYLAND, at supra.

Spenser, Edmund, one of the three most eminent English poets, was b. in London in 1552 or 1553, (most applied to the form of the country of t probably the former,) and d. Jan. 16, 1598-9, at a lodg-ing-house in King Street, Westminster. He was imme-diately descended from the Spensers of Hurstwood, Lancashire, and claimed kindred ("and had his claims allowed") with the family of Sir John Spenser of Althorp. (See Mother Hubberds Tale: Phillis, Charyllis, and sweet Amaryllis,—the poot's kinswomen.) He was admitted a sizar of Pembroke Hall, May 20, 1569; became B.A. Jan. 16, 1573, M.A. June 26, 1576, and on leaving college paid a visit to his connections in Lancashire; found there a fair damsel, the "widdowe's daughter of the glenne," and, as in poetic-duty bound, immediately fell deeply in love, and celebrated his own devotion and ten deeply in love, and celebrated its own devotion and the ledy's charms under the orthodox names of Colin and Rosalinde. (See The Shepheardes Calendar, Eclogues April and June, and Colin Clout's Come Home Again.) Who this lady was has been a fruitful subject of debate for more than two centuries; though the college friend of the swain, E. K. (Edmund Kirke?) who contributed the Introductory Epistle and the Notes to the Shepheardes Calendar, gives a broad hint in the re-mark that Rosalinde is a "feigned name, which, being well ordered, will bewray the very name of his love and mistress." According to a late American critic, Mr. Halpin, (see Atlantic Monthly, Boston, Nov. 1858, 677,) the proper "ordering" of Rosalinde is Rose Daniel, a sister of a historian and poet chronicled on a preceding page, (DANIEL, SAMUEL, p. 474,) who subsequently rejected "Colin" and became the wife of another of our family of authors, John Florio, the Resolute, (p. 608, supra.) The conduct of the disappointed suitor was worthy of the imitation of all fellow-sufferers: he did not suddenly awake to an affected consciousness of the real insignificance of those charms and virtues which had been woord in vain, but, on the contrary, fourteen years later, (see his Colin Clovts Come Home Againe, supposed to have been written in 1591,) exalts her merits and attractions in the highest strains, and finds fault only with the ambition which prompted such unbecoming aspirations:

"Not then to her that scorned thing so base, But to myselfe the blame that lookt so hie." Of course he could never be consoled,-never think of another love :

"And ye, my fellow shepheards, which do see
And hear the languors of my too long dying, Unto the world for ever witnesse beThat hers I die, mought to the world denying
This simple trophe of her great conquest."

But—Alas for lovers' vows! —in this same year, or the next, the poet met with a beautiful Irish girl, ("Elizabeth,") probably Miss Nagle, who, after a pursuit of two years, consented to be captured,—it would appear, not a years, consented to be captured,—it would appear, not a moment too suon: but he shall tell his own story:

"Lyke as a huntaman after weary chace,
Seeing the game from him secapt away,
Sits downe to rest him in some standy place,
With panting hounds beguiled of their prey,
So, after long pursuit and vaine assay,
When I all weary had the chace forsooke,
The gentle deer returned the selfe-same way,
Thinking to quench her thirste at the next brooke;
There sha, beholding me with mylder looke,
Sought not to flye, but feeriess still did bide;
Till I in hand her, yet halfs trembling, gooke,
And with her owne good will her fyrmely tyde;
Brange thing, me seemd, to see a heast so wyld
So goodly wonne, with her owne will beguylt?

The bridegroom offebrated his nuptials with this lovely being in those magnificent strains which have made this event forever memorable in the chronicles of the marringes of posts: riages of posts;

"Speece"s Epithalamium on his own marriage, written perhaps in 1694," remarks an eminent critic, "is of a far higher mood than any thing we have named. It is a strain recloient of a bridegroum's joy and of a poet's fascy. The English language seems to expand itself with a population unknown before, while he pours forth the varied imagery of this splendid little poem. Spenser, Edmund, one of the three most eminent it was received by Rosaling contrasting the result of the first and late the contrasting the result of the first and late. his courtships, contrasting the result of the first and (at least) the second of these enterprises: we must now re-turn to an earlier period of his life.

In 1578, at the suggestion of Gabriel Harvey, with whom he had contracted a friendship at Pembrok Hall, (see Harvey, Gabriel, LL.D., No. 1,) Spenser came to London, where, by the good offices of the scholar who Sir Philip Sidney, who presented him to the Earl of Leicester. Nine years before this, he had read his verses -not his name—in print.

In May, 1569, (in French, Lon., 1568, 8vo,) John Vander Noodt, a Flemish physician living in England, published a collection entitled A Theatre wherein be represented as wel the Miseries and Calamities that follow the voluptuous Worldlings, as also the great Ioyes and Plesures which the Faithfull do enioy, sm. 8vo, pp. 276. Prefixed to the contents of this volume are 21 engravings on wood, being illustrations of the Visions of Petrarch and of Bellay; and these are illustrated by metrical versions, called Epigrams and Sonnets, by Spenser, then about seventeen years of ago. They are without his name, but appear, with alterations, in his Complaints, published in 1591.

Vander Noodt's volume is very rare: it is priced in the Bibl. Anglo-Poet. 779, £25; the same copy was sold at Midgeloy's for £15 4s. 6d., and Bindley's copy was sold for £22 1s. A copy in J. Lilly's Catalogue, Nov.—Dec. 1857, p. 33, is priced £10 10s. Since this juvenile essay he had, from time to time, employed his pen both in prose and poetry. A portion of these etchings were afterwards incorporated with the Facric Queene; others— The Dying Pelicane, Stemmata Dudleiana, &c .- bave been lust.

In 1579 (the year after his arrival in London) he published (anonymously) The Shepheardes Calendar, (ascribed by some of his contemporaries to Sir Philip Sidney;) in 1580 he became, through the influence of Sidney, Secretary to Lord Grey of Wilton, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland; and in 1586 received from the crown a grant of 3029 acres (including the castle and manor of colman) in the county of Cork, forseited by the Earl of Desmond. In 1588 he was appointed Clerk of the Council of Munster, and in the next year received from Sir Walter Raleigh the memorable visit to which we have already briefly alluded in our life of the latter, referring the reader, for fuller particulars, to Spenser's own charming narration in Colin Clovts Come Home Againe. When was a poet ungrateful for the timely appearance of a genial and appreciative auditor? Such a one—The Shepheard of the Ocean, as the poet styles him—now listened with delight to the noble verses of the Facrie Queene, of which Books I. and II. and almost all of Book III. were ready for the press. Raleigh thought this indeed "a dish to set before a Queen," and—for and—for authors are not proverbially incredulous respecting the merits of their compositions—he encouraged the hopes of the minstrel, and took him with him to England. Let us quote Spenser's own version of this most interesting interview and its effects:

"One day (quoth he) I sat (as was my trade)
Under the foot of Mole, that mountain hore,
Keeping my sheepe amongst the cooly shade
Of the greens alders by the Mullaes shore:
There a strannge shopheard channet to find me out;
Whether allured with my pipes delight,
Whose pleasing sound yeartiled far about,
Or thither led by chaunce, I know not right:
Whom, when I saked from what place he came,
And how he hight, himselfe he did yclospe ...
The Shepheard of the Ocean by name,
And said he came far from the main-sea despe.

"He, sitting me boside in that same shade, Provoked me to plaie some pleasant fit; And when he heard the musicks which I mai He found himselfo full greatly pleased at it.

He me perswaded forth with him to fare; Nought tooks I with me, but my oates quill; South tooks I with me, but my oates quill; So to the sea we came."

He brings him before the Queen: the great Elizabeth (Cynthia) listens, and is charmed:

The Shepheard of the Ocean (quoth he)
Unto that Goddesse grace me first sphaned.
And to mine otten pipe inclined her eare.
That she theucoforth therein gan tike delight.
And it desired at limely houres to heare,
All were my notes but rude and roughly dight.
For not by measure of her own great mynd
And wondrons worth, she most my simple cong.
But my'd that country shepheard ought could fynd
Worth barkening to, emongst that learned throng."
Colin Courts Come Home Agains.

The first three Books of the Paeris Oueans wars not.

The first three Books of the Facrie Queene were published in 1590, and the event was signalized by a royal grant of a pension of £50 per annum. From 1591 to 1595 he lived on his Irish estate, dividing his time between his acres, his Facric Queene, and the more substantial Queen to whom, as we have seen, he was united by marriage in the last of the years above named. In logo he visited London for the purpose of attending to some business, the most agreeable part of which was the publication of Books IV., V., and VI. of his great poem, which were given to the world in 1598. The Shepherd was not entirely forgotten at court, and in September, 1598, by the influence of Elizabeth, Spenser was appointed Sheriff of the county of Cork. In the next month cocurred what is called "the rebellion of the Earl of Tyrone," who,

Tyrone," who,
"having dispersed the forces which were sent against him by the Earl of Ormond, ravaged and spoiled the whole county of Cork; so that Spenser was forced to seek his safety, together with his wid, in his native country, leaving his estate in frehad to be plundered by the rebels; who, it is said, having carried off his goods, burnt his house and a fais little child in it. However that be, it is certain he did not long survive this irretrievably ruinous calamity, which, reducing him to a state of absolute dependence, with the additional weight of a family, entirely broke his heart, and he languished under it until his dooth.

Thus, after this reducing be been and worthy gentleman had struggled with powerty all his lifetime, he died in extreme indigence and want of brend. However, some anonde was made to his fame at last; his sorpes being interred in Westmunster, near Chancer, as he had desired, and his obsequies attended by near Chancer, as he had desired, and his obsequies attenues by the Poets of that time, and others, who paid the last honours to his memory. Several copies of verses were thrown after him late his grave; and Robert Devoreux, Earl of Essex, who had married the widow of Sir Philip Sidney, was at the expense of the funeral. A handsome monument also, with an inscription, was erected in honour of him by Anne, Countess of Dorset."-Biog. Brit., 3810-12.

This monument, crected in 1620, was, by the zeal of Mason and some other admirers of genius, restored in 1778. Ben Jonson's assertion (reported by Drummond of Hawthornden) that Spenser "died for lacke of bread," and "refused twenty pieces sent to him by my lord of Essex, adding, Ho was 'sorry he had no time to spend them," has been confidently challenged by some of those sages who are always so much better informed respecting the events of preceding ages than those who lived and moved in them; but we are obliged by all rules of evidence, however unwillingly, to credit the testimony of Spenser's contemporaries that he died in poverty. The spenser's contemporaries that he died in poverty. The melancholy story of the day is pathetically recited in The Returne from Parnassus, or the Scourge of Simony, publiquely acted by the Students of St. John's, Cambridge, London, 1606, 4to, (reprinted by Hawkins in his Origin of the English Drama:)

A swifton [sweeter] swan than ever sung in Po.
A shriller nightingsle than ever blest
The prouder groves of self-admiring Rome;—
Blith was each valley, and each shepherd proud,
While he did chant his carol minatrelsie; While he did chant his carol minartelia; Attentive was full many a dainty Eare, Which hung upon his melting tongue, While to the water's fall he tun'd for fame, And on each berk engrar'd Eliza's name: And yet, for all, the unregarding soile Unlext the line of his desired life, Denying maintenance for his dear relief; Carriess care to provide his exequire, Searce deigning to shut up his dying sys.

But softly may our honours ashes rest That lie by mery Chaucer's noble chest."

Shakspeare, also, who had written,

"Speaser to me, whose deep conceit is such As passing all conceit, needs no defence," with Mr. Ruight in referring this couplet to the demise (1592) of Robert Greens.

"Poorly (poore man!) he lived; pearly (poore man!) he died," exclaims Phiness Fletcher, when lamenting the author of the Facric Queene in his Purple Island:
Spencer left two sons,—Sylvanus and Peregrine: that bis young and lovely widow, whose charms and virtues he had himself made so famous, should be sought and won, will surprise no one. She married Roger Seckerstone.

Many documents and authorities have been discovered which have only lately been capable of being adduced as evidence. . . not disposed to admit that Spenser is equal to Theoretius:

"His eclogues are somewhat too long, if we compare them with the ancients. He is sometimes too allegorical, and treats of matters of religion in a pastoral style, as the Mantian had done before him. He has employed the lyric measure, which is contrary to the practice of the old poets. His stanza is not still the same, nor always well chosen. ... The addition Spenser has made of a Calendar to his Eclogues, is very beautiful; since by this, besides the general moral of innocence and simplicity, which is common to other authors of pastoral, he has one peculiar to himself: he compares human life to the several seasons, and at once exposes to his readers a view of the great and little workles, in their various changes and aspects."—Pore: A Discourse on Fusicale, 1701; prefixed to Pope's Pastorals.

"Master Edmund Spenser had done enough for the immortality of his name had he only given us his Shepherd's Kulendar; a master-piece, if any,"—Parytov: Prof. to his Pastorals.

"Two great defects have contributed deeply to injure the popularity of his Calendar; the adoption of a language much too old and obsolete for the age in which it was written, and the too copous introduction of satire on eclesiastical affairs."—Dr. Dr. KE. Shakep, and his Times, i. 646.

"The shepherd's Objenser's "Calendar' are parsons in disguise, who converse about heathen divinities and points of Christian theology. Palinole defends the inxurios of the Catholic clergy, and Piers extols the purity of Archinehop Grindal; concluding with the story of a fox, who came to the house of a goat in the character of a pediar, and obtained admittance by pretending to be a sheep. This may be burlesquing Æsop, but certainly is not imitating Theoretius. There are fine thoughts and images in the "Calendar' but, on the whole, the obscurity of those pastorals is rather their covering, than their principal defect."—CAMPERLI, Specimens of Kept. Piet.

"The poet supposes that the Faery Queen, according to an established annual custom, held a magnificent feast, which continued twelve days, on each of which respectively twelve several complaints are presented before her. To reduces the injuries which were the occasion of these several complaints, she despatches, with proper commissions, twelve different huights, each of which, in the particular adventure allotted to him, proves an example of some particular virtue, as of Hollness, Temperance, Justice, Chastity, and has one complete book assigned to him, of which he is the here. But besides these twelve knights, serveally exemplifying twelve moral virtues, the Poet has constituted one principal knight or general here,—Prince Arthur,—who represents, as we have seen, Magnificence. Prince Arthur,—who represents, as we have seen, Magnificence, the perfection of all the rest. He, moreover, assists in very book, and at the end of his actions is to discover and win Glorians, or Glory."—Provenson Wilson: Blacker, Mag., xxxvi. 421.

"[In Epic poetry] the English have only to boast of Spenser and Milton, who neither of them wanted either genine or isarning to have been perfect poets, and yet both of them are liable to many censures. For there is no uniformity in the design of Spenser, he aims at the accomplishment of no one action; he raises up a hero for every one of his adventures, and endows each of them will some particular moral virtue, which renders them all equal, without subordination or preference. Every one is most valiant in his own legend; only we must do him that justice to observe that magnanimity, which is the character of Prince Arthur, shines throughout the whole poem, and succours the rest when they are in distress. The original of every knight was then living in the court of Queen Elizabeth; and he attributed to each of them that virtue which he thought was most conspicuous in them.—an ingenious piece of flattery, though it turned not much to his account. Had he lived to fluish his poem, in the six remaining legends, it had certainly been more of a piece, but could not have been perfect, iscause the model was not true. But Prince Arthur, or his chief patron, Sir Philip Sidney, whom he intended to make bappy by the marriage of his differance, who make intended to make bappy by the marriage of his differance, and the ill choles of his stanza are faults but of the sec and nagnitude; for, notwithstanding the first, he is still untelligible, at least after a little processes; and for the last, he is the more to be admired that, lastouring under such a difficulty, his verses are an numerous, so various, and se harmomous that only Virgii, whom he professely, unitated, has surdifficulty, his verses are so numerous, so verious, and so harmonious that only Virgil, whom he professedly initated, has surpassed him among the Romans, and only Mr. Waller among the English."—Deeper Profect to the trans. of Joseval, 1683, fol.

to die almoet for want. This poet contains great beauties; a sweet and harmonious versification, easy elecution, a fine imagination; yet does the perusal of his work become so tedious, that one never finishes it from the mere pleasure which it affords. It soon becomes a kind of task reading; and it requires some effort and resolution to carry us to the end of his long performance. This effect, of which every one is conscious, is usually ascribed to the change of manners. But manners have more changed since Homer's age; and yet that poet remains still the favourite of every reader of taste and judgment. Homer copied true natural manners, which, however rough or uncultivated, will always form an agreeable and interesting picture. But the pench of the English poet was employed in drawing the affectations and conceits and fepperies of chivalry, which appear ridiculous as soon as they lose the recommendation of the mode. The tediousness of continued allegory, and that too seldon striking or ingenious, has also contributed to render the Rairy Queen peculiarly thresome; not to mention the too great frequency of its descriptions, and the languor of its stanza. Upon the whole, Spenser meintains his place upon the shelves among our English classics; but he is seldom seen on the table; and there is scarcely any one, if he dares to be ingenuous, but will confess that, notwithstanding all the merit of the poet, he affords an entertainment with which the palate is soon satiated. "To initate the fictions and sentiments of Spenser can incur no reproach; for allegory is perhaps one of the most pleasing vehicles of instruction. But I am very far from extending the same respect to his diction as his stanza. His style was in his own time allowed to be vicious, so darkened with old words and peculiarities of phrase, and so remote from common use, that Josson boldly pronounces him to have written no language. But did not Jonson refer to the Shepheardes Calendar! His stanza is at once difficult and unpleasing; thresome to the ear by its uniformity, and to the attention by its length. It was at first formed in imitation of the Italian pasts, without due regard to the genius of our language."—Dr. Jonson: Rambler, No. 121, May 14, 1751.

"Even Spenser himself, though assuredly one of the greatest poets that ever lived, could not succeed in the attempt to make allegory interesting. It was in vain that he lavished the riches of his mind on the Bouse of Pride and the House of Temperance. One unpardonable Ruit, the fault of todioueness, pervades the whole of the Exity Queen. with what satisfaction would the good bishop have hailed Mr. Collier's critical edition! To dens of dragons and enchanted woods.
But now the mystic tale, that pleas'd of yore,
Can charm an understanding age no more;
The long-spun allegories fulsome grow,
While the dull moral lyes too plain below.

On another occasion he remarked,

The Facric Queene was also the delight of Scott's boy-

"But Spenser I could have read forever. Too young to trouble my-reli about the allegory, I considered all the knights and ladies and dragons and giants in their outward and exoteric sense; and God only knows how delighted I was to find myself in such society. "The claim of Spenser to be considered as a sacred poet does by no means rest upon his hymns alone... But whoever will attentively consider the Fairy Queen itself will find that it is, almost throughout, such as might have been expected from the rather of those truly sacred hymns. It is a continual, deliberate endeavour to enlist the restless intellect and chivalrous feelings of an inquiring and romantic age on the side of goodness and faith, of purity and justice... Spenser, then, was essentially a sacred poet; but the delicary and insinuating gratitiones of his disposition were better fitted to the velled than the direct mode of instruction... To Spenser, therefore, upon the whole, the English reader must revert as being pre-aminently the sacred poet of his country."—Kaska: Lon. Quar. Rev., 225, 221: Sacred Poetry.

They are afraid of the allegory, as if they thought it would bite them; they look at it as a child looks at a painted dragon; and think it will strangle them in its shinting folds. This is very idle. If they do not meddle with the allegory, the allegory will not meddle with them. Without minding it at all, the whole is as plain as a pike-staff. It might as well be pretended that we cannot see Ponsain's pictures for the allegory, as that the allegory prevents us from understanding Spenser. . . Of the fervour and vigour of these preams an estimate may be formed from their effect upon one of the most cautious, we had almost said coldest, of critics :

cautious, we had almost said coldest, of critics:

"It has been justly observed by a living writer of the most ardent and enthusiastic gentus, whose eloquence is as the rush of mighty waters, and has left it for others almost as invidous to praise in terms of loss rapture, as to cansure what he has been calong in the stream of unhesitating eulogy, that 'no poet has ever had a more exquisite sense of the beautiful than Spenser.'... [Note:] I allude here to a very brilliant series of papers on the Faery Queen, published in Blackwood's Magasine during the years 1834 and 1835. [Note, 182:] They are universally ascribed to Professor Wilson."—HALLE: Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1834, it 136.

"His language is always beautiful. . . . All his sermous de-wree a reading."—Da. Beausages.

But Sir John Hawkins tells us that "the tincel of sprat disgusted" Dr. Johnson. As a poet his reputation has never been high. Pope calls him "a worse Cowley," (Spenor's Anesdetes, seek iv.;) Johnson dismisses his believe that a three and many paragraphs, (Lives) elaims in two or three contemptuous paragraphs, (Lives of the Eug. Peets.) Southey makes a very obvious pun on his gatenagmic, (Spee. of Eng. Peets, 1. 168;) and a late very eminent critic considers his admission into the family of poets a disadvantage which his merits as a prose writer have not been able to evercome:

proce writer have not been able to evercome:
"Unhappity for his fama, it has been usual to print his worses in collections of the British poets; and those who judge of hist by his verses must consider him as a servile leakt for, who, without one spark of Cowley's admirable gantes, mindleded whatever was least commendable in Cowley's manner; but those who are acquainted with Sprat's proce writings will form a very different estimate of his powers. He was, indeed, a great master of our language, and possessed at once the electrons "—Lord Maraulat. Hist. of England, it. ch. vi.
Avainst such testimony as this, the depreciation of Against such testimony as this, the depreciation of Lord Orrery (Remarks on the Life and Writings of Swift, 1752, 237) and of Dr. Drake (Resays illustrative of the Tatler, &c., i. 69) weighs but little.

"I have heard it observed with great justice," remarks Dr.

Johnson, after an enumeration of his volumes, "that every book is of a different kind, and that each has its distinct and characteristical excellence"—Life of Sprat.

Bri. 1839, 398.

"The history is not written in an interesting manner; it is minute on trifting, and brief on important, points. The infidel objection is often afrongly stated and weakly answered. The criticisms on passages of Scripture are selden original or profound. Patrick, Poole, Le Cierc, Holdegger, and [Samuel] Parkor's Bibliotheca supply the greater part of the notes. The theological sentiments are neither correct nor consistent; and as a view of the connexton between sacred and profane history it is decidedly inferior to Shuckford and Prideaux. Gleig's edition is certainly more valuable than the former oace; but several of the above remarks are applicable to his additions as well as to the original work."—Orme's Bibl. Bib., 1826, 418.

Stanhope, Lady Hester, the eldest child of Charles, third Earl of Stanhope, (supra.) by his first wife, Lady Hester Pitt, eldest daughter of William, first Earl of Chatham, after the death of her uncle William Pitt, the eminent statesman, with whom she was domesticated, took up her residence first in Wales, and in 1810 in Syria, and there remained until her death, June 23, 1839, aged 63. Her permanent abode was at her villa of D'Joun, on Mount Lebanon, eight miles from Sidon. Her dress was that of an Arabian chieftain, and the Bedouins long regarded her as the Queen of the Wilderness. In her later years she seems to have lost pretty much every thing but her temper,-which was despotic in the highest degree. Let us not fail to add that, in her "better days," her charities were co-extensive with her choler, and were often as injudiciously bestowed. For the details of her remantic life we refer to--1. The author made a tour of these countries, 1852-53; but in Sinsi and Palestine we have rather a summary of the observations and researches of others than the

of the observations and researches of others than the defails of personal inspection.

"We know few books of travel which present such evidences of extensive erudation and accurate research; certainly not one which unites so happily great reading and solid judgment, and which turns the learning of others so liberally to account, without the least compromise of its own freedom of thought,"—

Belin. Rev., Oct. 1804, act. 181, [Sinot, Pulcather, and Medit.].

"As a narrative of travel, it is the best which has been written on a backneyed subject; while the elucidation of the liberty of the Jaws, from the scenes in the midst of which they lived and acted, is as excellent in the execution as it is wise and retinual in design."—Wester. On which a critic remarks,

"A singular book has just been published by a Scotch Doctor of Medicine, named Nark. The writer endeavors to show that the teaching of our Lordas displayed in St. Luke's Gospel differs not only from modern churches, but also from the doctrines taught by Paul and the other Apoetles. He does not, however, seem quite equal to the task which he has undertaken."

The Lon. Juriet (March, 1842; see, also, No. 269) also awards the preference to Starkle over Phillipps and Peake; Professor Anthon (Essay on the Study of the Law) places Starkle above Phillipps; Warren (Law Stu., ed. 1845, 755) considers Starkle's "incomparably the best treatise on the law of evidence hitherto published" in reasse on the law or evidence altherto published in England, but thinks that Greenlean's treatise (p. 734, supra) "is perhaps still better adapted than that of Mr. Starkie for a first book in this branch of legal science." See, also, TAYLOR, JOHN PITT, (infra.) The Tender Husband; from 1709 to 1713, when he was chosen M.P. for Stockbridge, Hampshire, was a Comissioner of the Stamp Office; expelled from the Heuse of Commons for passages in The Crisis, and The Englishman, March, 1714; Surveyor of the Royal Stables at Hampton Court, Governor of the Royal Company of Comedians, Justice of the Peace for Middlesex, knighted, M.P. for Boroughbridge, Yorkshire, and a Commissioner of Fortested Estates in Scotland, all in 1715; in Janu-ary, 1720, commenced (under the name of Sir John Edgar) The Theatre, which was published every Tuesday and Saturday until April 5 following; January 23, 1720, was greatly distressed by the revocation of his patent as Governor of the Royal Company of Comedians, by which calamity he estimated his losees at nearly £10,000, (see his State of the Case, 1720, and his Epist. ('orresp., 489;) in 1721 brought out, with great success, his Comedy of The Conscious Lovers, the dedication of which was acknowledged by the king by a present of £500, spent his last years at his seat at Llangunner, near Caermarthen, Wales, and there died, of a paralytic disorder, Sept. 1, 1729. According to his own request, his body was privately interred. His first wife was a lady of Barbadoes, with whom he received a plantation; his second wife was the daughter of Jonathan Sourlock, of Llangunnor, Esq., by whom he had one daughter and two sons: the latter both died young; the daughter, Elizabeth Steele, in 1732 became the wife of the Honourable John Trever, afterwards Baron Trever of Bromham. Steele was one of the most amiable and one of the most improvident of men. His precepts were far better than his practice; his principles proved no match for his tastes. Otten sinning, often repenting, always good natured, and generally in debt, he multi-plied troubles as few men will, and bore them better 1713-Oct. 1, 1713, 176 numbers: by Steele, 32; Addison, 53; other known contributors, 41, == 176. Collected; Lon., 2 vols. in 1, 8vo, 1714, frequently reprinted in 8vo, 12mo, &c., and as above, (No. 6:) see, also, Addison, Joseph, (pp. 38, 39, supra;) Nos. 8, 9, infra; and Westminster Abbey, or Reminiscences of Past Literature, Jan. 1869.

(pp. 38, 39, supra;) Nos. 8, 9, infra; and Westminster Abbey, or Reminiscences of Past Literature, Jan. 1869.

"Steele will be found in purity and simplicity inferior to Tilebson; to Temple in elegance and harmony; to Dryden in richness, mellowness, and variety. To the two former, however, in is equal in correctness; to the latter in vivacity; and with all he is nearly on a level as to case and perspicuity. Steele's great misfortune has ever been the comparison, so perpetually drawn with regard to style, between himself and Addison. The proximity of their productions has naturally led to the consideration of their respective merits in point of composition; and though it must be allowed that from the best manner of Addison Steele stands widely apart, yet are there several papers which, having been written by Sir Richard with more than usual care, and with evident marks of emulation, appear to have imbibed a pertion of Addisonian grace."—Ds. Daaxz: Essays illusts of the Tutler, Spec., and Guardian, 2d ed., 1814, 1.201.

"Steele seems to have gone into his closet chiefly to set down what he observed out of doors. Addison seems to have spent most of his time in his study, and to have spun out and wiredrawn the hints, which he borrowed from Steele or took from nature, to the utmost. Tam far from wishing to depreciate Addison's talents, but I am anxious to do justical and more original writer. The humourous descriptions of Steele resemble loose sketches, or fragments of a comeday; those of Addison are rather comments, or ingenious paraphrases, on the original text."—Haturr: Lects, on the English Comic Writers, Lect. V.: (The Pariodical Essayista.) See, also, Lect. VIII.

"Steele, who in his comedies successfully engrated modern characters on the aucient dramas."—Snother: Hist. of Eng.: George L. Noten.

"The great, the appropriate praise of Steele is, to have been the first who, after the licentious age of Charles the Berond, endeavoured to introduce the Virtues on the singe,"—Da. Dalka: Range Stautenties of the Tuler, de., 2d ed., 1814, 186, (q. w.)

"Steele's Conscious Lovers is the first councily which can be called moral."—Hallank: Lif. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 528, u. See, also, Elackw. Mag., iz. 253.

"The consecties of Speele were the first that were written expressly with a view not to initiate the manners, but to reform the merch, of the age. . . Nothing can be better meant, or more inefficient. It is almost a missioner to call them consection: they are rither homilies in dialogue."—Harlit: Lects. on the Harlit Charles Writers, Lect. VILI.

was b. at Stepney, 1736; became a scholar of King's College, Cambridge, 1734; spent his latter years in opulent obscurity in Hampstead, and d. there, 1800. He mas a contributor to Johnson's Lives of the Poets: was a contributor toe Johnson's Lives of the Poets; Dodelsy's Annual Register, (in which see his Frantic Lover;) Isaac Reed's Biog. He was a draughteman as well as a writer. He was sour, splenetic, and untruthful, yet as liberal with his purse as diliberal in his temper. His chief delight was in anohymous attacks (in the Critical Review, and St. James's Chronicle) upon his fellow-fical decision of the lived in a brock, and died in a storm. "Steevens is a dangerous guide for such as do not look well about them. His errors are specious; for he was a man of ingenuity: but he was often wantonly mischievous, and delighted to stumble for the mere gratification of dragging unsuspicious innocents into the mire with him. He was, in short, the very Puck of commentators."—W. Gifford: Lon. Quar. Rev., Dec. 1811. 478. 1811 478

in Antony and Gioopatra, Act III., Scene Al., "the only recommendation of which appears to be that it gives occasion for a note by Steevens, emulating many others that have rindered the variorum edition of Shakspeure one of the filthlest hooks in our language. If there he a possibility of distorting Shakspeur into indelicacy, Steevens, in his own name or under the disgulse of Amner or of Collins, never missed the opportunity."—Pictorial Shakspere, 2d ed., 1867, vl. 312, u. Sterne, Laurence, nephew of the preceding, greatgrandson of Richard Sterne, Ar hbishop of York, (infra,) and son of Roger Sterne, a lieutenant in the British army, was h. at Clonmel, Ireland, (where his parents had arrived from Dunkirk only a few days before the event,) November 24, 1713; was placed at school at Halifax, England, 1723; sent by his cousin, Mr. Sterne, of Elvington, to Jesus College, Cambridge, 1733, and took the degree of B.A. 1736, and of M.A. 1740; on leaving the University, received holy orders, and, by the interest of his uncle, Dr. Jacques Storne, obtained the living of Sutton, Yorkshire, and Jan. 16, 1740-41, a probend in York Cathedral: was married 1741, and received from a friend of his wife the living of Stillington, also in Yorkshire, and about a mile and a half from Sutton; retained his connection with these two places for nearly twenty years, preaching on Sundays, and reading, "painting, fiddling, and shooting" during the week; published the first two volumes of Tristram Shandy in 1759, and immediately became famous; was presented by Lord Falconbridge with the curacy of Coxwold, Yorkshire, 1760; in the same year took a house at York for his wife and only child, (Lydia,) but from this date appears to have spent the most of his own time either in London or on the Continent: in 1762 went to France, whither he was followed by his wife and daughter, who remained abroad— although Sterne himself returned to England more than once—until the autumn of 1767; d. at his lodgings in: Bond Street, Loudon, March 18, 1768. A standing re-proach to the profession which he disgraced, grovelling in his tastes, indisorcet, if not licentious, in his habits, he lived unhonoured, and died unismented, save by tho who found amusement in his wit or countenance in his immorafity.

"Tristram Shandy' is still a greater object of admiration, the man as well as the book; one is invited to dinner, when he dines, a fortnight before. As to the volumes yet published, i. and ii...] there is much good fun in them, and humour nomerities bit and sometimes missed. Have you sund his 'Skraiona,' with his own tomick figure, from a painting by Reynolds, at the head of them? They are in the style I think most proper for the pulpit, and show a strong imagination and a sensible heart; but you see him often tottering on the verge of laughter, and ready to throw his perway in the face of his audience."—Grav, the Poct, June 22, 1760: Gray's Letters.

"If we consider Sterne's reputation as chiefly founded dustrians Shaudy, he must be regarded as liable to two soverecharges,—those, naturely, of indevency and nection. Upon the first accossition Sterne was humself peculiarly sore, and used is justily the licentumeness of his humour by representing it as a mere breach of discorum, which had no pertinus consequences to morals.

Sterne, however, began and safety by braving the censure of the world in this particular.

In like missing, the greatest admirers of Sterne must own that his style is affected, emigently, and in a degree which even his swit and pathos are indequate to support. The style of Raiolaia, which he asammed for his model, is to the highest excess rambling, excursive, and informingled with the greatest absurdates. But Rabelais was in some measure compelled to adopt this Harlequin's habit, in order that, like licenced j-steric he night, under the cover of his billy, have permission to vent his satire against church and state. Sterne assumed the manner of his master only as a mode of attracting attention and of making the public stare; and therefore his extravagencies, like those of a feigned madman, are cold and forced, even in the midde of his most irregular flights.

The style employed by Sterne is fanctifully ornamented, but at the same time vigorous and maculiue, and full of that animation and force which can only be derived by an acquaintance with the early English processing of the heart, he has never been excelled, if Indeed he has ever been equalled, and may be at once recorded as one of the most affected and one of the most single of the heart, he has never been excelled, if these he has ever been equalled, and may be at once recorded as one of the most affected and one of the most single of witers,—as one of the greatest plagiarists and one of the soct viers,—as one of the greatest plagiarists and one of the soct viers,—as one of the greatest plagiarists and one of the so

"Voltaire has compared the merits of Rabelais and Sterns as satirists of the abuse of learning, and I think has done neither of them justice. This great distinction is obvious: that Rabelais of them justice. This great distinction is obvious: that Rabelais derided absurdities then existing in full force, and intermingbed nuch storing sense with the grossest parts of his book; Sterns, on the contrary, laughs at many exploded qualons and forsaken fooleries, and contrives to degrade some of his most solemn passages by a victous levity. Rubelais flew a higher pitch, too, than Sterns. "Sterne has published two little volumes, called 'Sentimental' Travels.' We quote a few sad lines from a work recently published:

"The celebrated writer Sterne, after being long fine ided of this town, died in a mean ledging, without a single friend who sett interest in his fate, except Becket, his bookeeller, who was the only person who attended his internent. [These was one other person, probably-aftr. James, in the carriage] He was best reperson, probably-aftr. James, in the carriage] He was best self as graveyard near Tyburn, belonging to the parish of Marylebone, and the corpse, being marked by some of the reservence on the self and an anomaly professor of Cambridge" A gentleman, who was present at the dissection told me [Malone] he recognised Sterne's face the mount he saw the bedy."—Sar Jones Frace's Lafe of Missond Malone, 1860, 8vo.

We are untilling to conclude without the citation of a few more oblinious on this still favourite author:

my are unusually to quantitue without the custion of a few more opinions on this still favourite author:

"His styla is . . . at times the most rapid, the most happy, the most idiomatic, of any that is to be found. It is the pure element of English, conversational style. His works consist only of mercentar—of brilliant passages. I wonder that Goldentin, who ought to have known better, should call him 'a dull fallow,'

His wit is pougnant, though artificial; and his characters (though the groundwork of some of them had been laid before) have yet invaluable original differences, and the spirit of the execution, the master strokes constantly thrown into them, are not to be surpassed. It is sufficient to name them '-- Yorick, Dr. Stoff, Mr Shandy, My Uncle Toby, Trim, Rusanna, and the Widow Wadham. In these he has contrived to oppose, with equal colicity and originality, two characters, one of pure intellect and the other of pure good nature, in My Father and My Uncle Loby. There appears to have been in Storne a vely of dry, sarcastic humour, and of extrime tenderness of feeling; the latter some time carried to discitation, as in the tale of Maria, and the appostrophe to the recording angel, but at other times pure and sometimes carried to effectation, as in the bale of Maila, and the apostrophe to the recording angel, but at other times pure and without blemish. The story of Le Forre is perhaps the fines in the English language. My Pather's restlessness, both of body and mind, as immitted le. It is the model from which all those dispicable performances against modern philosophy ought to have from copic in their authors had known any thing of the studiest have a compliments ever paid to human nature. He is the most unofficialing of Golfs cruttures or, as the French express it, as tell petat bon homme. Of his bowling given, his steges, and his amoute who would say of think any thing amiss? —Herrist Lects on the Laglach Conce Writers, Lect. VI. (On the Laglach Novelute).

As Hazlitt contrasts Sterne with Richardson, so does the author next to be cited contrast Sterne with Mackenzie, (q v., quotation from Sir Wulter Scott.)

kenzie, (q v., quotation irom Sir Wulter Soott.)

'We think that, on the whole, Mackenzie is the first master of this delicions style. Steric, doubtless, has despet touches of this delicions style. Steric, doubtless, has despet touches of this delicions style. Steric, doubtless, has despet touches of thought, one continuity of emotion,—no exit aded tange of thought, ever which the mind can breed—in his mp, nous and fantastical writings. His splitt is far too meteural and airy to suffer him tenderly to linger over those timages of weet humanity which he disaloses. His elevations by each the chain which his feeling spreads as by magic around us. His exquisite surability is ever countracted by his perception of the lindictons and his ambition after the strange. No harmonious feeling breathes from any class piece. He sweeps 'that curious institument, the human heart,' with hurred fingers eding forth in ray if succession is despest and its livelies notes and nexturgonly urred long discord. His pathos is indeed, most genums while it lasts, but the soul is not suffered to cherish the feeling which it lasts, but the soul is not suffered to cherish the feeling which it lasts, then the soul is not suffered to cherish the feeling which it lasts, then, though he could not equal belding in fluent wit, is a pragon of linely quaintiness, and in pathos is approached by Mackenie alone."—Sir D K Sandford.

"I read to them the passage in Bishop Horsley's Preface to the Psalms, where he calls Sterahold and Hopkins's an excellent translation, and denounces any one who dates to attempt a better. The beautiful parts of the Psalms are much better in their present form than they would be in any metrical version."—Thousas Moons: Memoirs, ii, 1833, 17.

"The first verse which I read was Pope's Pastorals; and the first criticism I recollect was an observation which I repeated after my aunts, on the great superiority of Tate and Brady's Psalms over Starnhold and Hopkins's version. I then spoke with the confidence of youth. I think it very likely that if were to re-examine the question I might now think it more doubtful."—She Jamss Mackinson: Life, i. ch. i.

"The metrical version of the Psalms, by Sternhold and Hopkins, first printed in 1562, was essentially for the people; and, accustomed as we have been to smile at the occasional want of refinement in this translation, its manily viscor, ay, and its bold harmony, may put to shame many of the feelier productions of later times."—Cambes Knicht: William Shakspere: a Biography: Pictorial Shakspere, 2d ed., 1867, vill. 43.

"Between the years 1847 and 1857 above £30,000 worth of Biblos, in all languages, were collected, collated, and passed into the libraries of Mr. Leuox, Mr. George Livermore, Mr. Fry, the British Museum, the Bodleiau, &c. In order to reduce his labours to the greatest degree of precision, he had about 400 pages 8ut up in very small clear type, uniform with the Nuggots, with most careful collations of each work. It was only in this way that he could identify and describe the various editions and ascertain their history. Not being satisfied with the work, only a few uncorrected proofs were taken, to serve as copy for a larger and better work."—HERRE STRYERS.

6. An Auslytical Index to the Colonial Documents of New Jersey in the State Paper Offices of England; Com-piled by Henry Stevens; Edited, with Notes and Refer-ences to Printed Books and Manuscripts in other Deposi-tories, by William A. Whitehead, N. York; Published for the New Jersey Historical Society, 1858, 8vo, pp. xxx., 504.

"Ably and thoroughly edited."-(N. Fork) Hist. Mag., Oct. 1858, 316.0

" For several years the historical students had been trying to prevait upon the Legislature of New Jersey to follow the expan-ple of M. York and procure historical Documents from Europe; but, all attempts failing, in 1849 Mr. Stevens's services where secured by his friend the Hos. James G. King. For nearly the years this laborious work was on the arryl. The rest of the stery is told by Mr. Whitshead in his Praduce; pp. xxi.—xxii.

Mr. Stevens having industriously prosecuted his re-searches, the conmittee charged with the administration of the fund provided for the procurement of the Index had the pleasure, on the 11th of September, 1851, of exhibiting to the Seciety nine quarto cases, covered with bine mo-recee, and having locks and keys, containing over eighteen hundred separate cards, each containing an abstract of some paper relating to New Jersey, beautifully engrossed, the cards being arranged chronologically, and each case having the first and last date lettered on the back, the whole forming a manuscript work of great value and unique appearance.

It was, therefore, with great cordinity and unanimity that the following resolution was passed by the Society

"Resolved, That the thanks of the New Jersey Historical Society be presented to Henry Stevens, Eq., now in London, for his distribunation, good indgenent, and fallelity in the selection and arrangement of his Index of the Solonial like time into of New Jersey, and that a copy of this resolution, duly authenticated, be transmitted to him by the Society"

Stevenson, Sir John Andrew, Mus. Doc., a Choral Vicar of Dublin Cathedral, son of a professor of music, was b. in Dublin, 1761, knighted, 1802, and d. Sept. 14, 1833.

From the year 1802 to 1818 Sir John Stevenson was constantly engaged in the formation of musical publications, in ossipanciton with his triend Mr. Moore. Their Irish Malodies were published in eight [nine] parts. Another work was a collection of popular pational airs; and a third, a series of secred sodge, dusts, and trics. Their success was complete. In 1822 Sir John Stevenson published; at two numbers of Fastins, the poetical parks having been written by his son-in-law, Mr. Dalleys; and a few years after he collected his Cathedral Anthems, sind published them in London, in two volumes. One of the last and greatest of his productions was his tratorio of his Thankagiying, which has often been performed at the Dublin cathedrain."—

Stewart, Dugald, the son of Matthew Stewart, D.D., Professor of Mathematics in the University of Edinburgh, (infra,) was b. in the College of Edinburgh, November 22, 1753, and pursued his studies at this institution with great distinction; in 1772 commenced lecturing from his father's desk, in 1774 was appointed his assistant, and on his death, in 1785, was elected his successor; in the same year succeeded Dr. Adam Ferguson (whose duties he had discharged during the session of 1778-79) in the chair of Moral Philosophy; in 1810 relinquished the active duties of the professorship to his collengue, (see Brown, Thomas, M.D.,) and retired to his colleague, (see Brown, Thomas, M.D.), and reured to Kinneil House, on the banks of the Firth of Forth, about twenty miles from Edinburgh, "where he spent the remainder of his days in philosophical retirement." His death occurred on the 11th of June, 1828, at No. 5, Ainslie Place, Edinburgh, where he had been for a few days on a visit. He was buried in the Canongate church yard, and a monument was creeted to his memory on the southwest shoulder of the Calton Hill, near the Observasouthwest shoulder of the Calton Hill, near the Observa-tory. From the year 1806 until his death, he enjoyed the sinceure office (created for his benefit) of Gazette-Writer for Scotland,—salary £600 per annum. This descended to his family. He was married first in 1783 to Helen Bannatyne, who died in 1787; secondly, in 1700, to Helen D'Arcy Cranstoun, who, with a son (Lieutouant-Colonel Matthew Stewart, infra) and a daughter, survived him.

In his 19th year he composed and read before a literary association the admired Essay on Dreaming, subsequently incorporated in vol. i. of No. 1. His pubheations are as follows:

Later critics have been much less enthusiastic:

"As a philosophical view of the progress of the metaphysical science, it is almost worthless. He never once rises to any comprehensive principle. There is no unity in that mass of withing, of criticians and notes. He never attempts to selve the applic of any ages and to show how it influenced others. All is isolated, Pleasant and clover as the adversaria of some student, but very metherent it looked on as a treatise or consulted as a history. As a specimen of his carelessness, we may mention the entire omission of Spinor; a man whose influence on speciality philosophy has been only second to that of his master less Cartes, Ills extrane carelessness as to any wastematic comprehension of what he was to perform, and his neglect as to arisingement of materials, are, as is emaited by a write; in the "Quarterly Review," [vvvi 477, Dr. Sayses] shown in the author's "Advertisement," wherein we are told that his mighted design (as is well known to his friends) was to comprise in the or twelve sheets all the preliminary matter which he was to contribute to the "Supplement" It has now extended to about sex times this length, and we are informed that he has only discussed one of that three divisions under which he had projected to arrange his anbisect. We cannot but observe that we think this fact sufficiently justifies all that we had ventured to say of the unpremidited of any destination of the height gaussid—that in our higher Philosophical Lite rature it we allo be difficult to find a less adequates to a time of some parts of the height of the optimization of what have been prepared —Ing ("ye, Inog, y, 1851, 722").

We had intended to quote the opinions of a number of eminent authorities respecting the subject a number of eminent authorities respecting the subject of our skitch as a man and a legal writer, but this in dulgence want of space obliges us to restrict. For the following estimate of his character, written at our request, we are indebted to a valued friend of ours, who know and loved the subject of his culogy and was known and beloved by him:

and beloved by him:

"That which characterized Judge Store, as a man, a scholar, a jurist, and a judge, may perhaps be summed up to this urn her He was of a most kind and genial tempergas a flushand, futher, and friend Aiding, in whatever manner, was a delight to him! He had a most sympathizing souh, and jeadousy was unknown to him. Whether a person applied to him in net J, whether a student young or old, durind him advice, whether an enterprise of common utility or elevated character was to be promoted, he was ready to aid to his utimet power hy its far therance. He had a large souh, and took that deepest interer in all branches and all culture. He was a patriot, in the widest sense, warmly loving his country and her musituition, but his particises did not narrow his mind. Humanity was his carthly deity. He was ardently devoted to his profession; but here, too, the law had no confining effect. Holding the principles of the Cominon Law an great honour, he acknowledged whatever is great he to Evil Law and in the jurisprudence of any other assistiff,—a fact well proved by his Decisions and Opinions, and especially by those branches of the law which he first curved but and presented as separate party. In this respect he was perhaps the most enlightened juriet that our land has produced. If we may leady say that the three constituents of a great judge are advect, detailed and continuous stude of the law, mawering conveientiousness mellowed by hin liv sympathy, and philosophical accument outside with the rare art of analysing complex cases into their elements in order to rise from them again ashipy an isteadily to general rules, we may assert that he especially excelled in the two test, laving hearder, few augeriers in the last. He added to all this the important faculty of a transparent and including age. He was fortunate in along early to a high sfatte ne that he was enabled by his gifts, labours, and correct notions as well as by the prints of his feelings, to make a distinct impression in the laboury this country was much sing that we know of no foreign of some of becoming thoroughly and compreh specify as an and of becoming thoroughly and compreh specify as a man of becoming thoroughly and compreh specify as a man in a peri do four country brinch we fear was great a than that in which we lis—the Francis Lister that layes his winds a man in a peri do four country brinch we fear was great a than that in which we lis—the Francis Lister that Lister that the traditions francis of my friend see fear was great a than that in which we lis—the Francis Lister than the strates of one friend Story are, upon the while, the mist finished and it or to their kink to be methin in my language for ign or directs, and for learning, inducts and takent house the most extraordinary juries of the part of the layer of

It is said that thirty editions were pub in London in 1952 in six months,—but here we will borrow a note from a transationtre authority from a transatiantic authority

The first Lendon edition was pullished in May 1852, and was not large for the furr pean popularity of a picture of negro life was doubted. But in the following beptember the London publisher a turnished to n in use 10 000 copies per day for about lour weeks and had to employ 1000 persons in preparing copies to supply the general demand. We cannot follow it beyond 1802, but at that time more than a million of copies had been said in England probably tentimes as many as have been sold of any other work, except the little and Prayer Box k. "In France 'United Tom still covers the shop windows of the Boilevards and one pullisher alone Enstand Barks, has ent out five different cliticus in different forms. Balore the end of 1864 it had been translated into Italian, Spanish, Danish, Swedish, Dutch, Flemning Gorman Polish and Maggar. There are two different lutch translations and travel different German ones and the Italian translations and travel different German such a tel in every capital in Europe and in the free States of America."—Edia Rev. (For particulars of the British editions, eee S. Low & Son's British Catalogues, Lon., 1862-79) We should like to supplement this bibliographical note by stating the number of copies sold to the present date; but we are assured, on the best authority, that it is impossible to estimate them,—but that they "amount to millions."

We are, however, anabled to present a List of the Transla-tions of Uncle Tym's Cabin to Oct. 1, 1863:

French, 3 or 4 versions. Russian, 2 versions. Garman, 13 or 14 "Dutch, 2" Polish. Magyar, 3 Wendish. Danish. Swedish. Wallachian, 2 " Portuguese. Armenian. Spanish. Arabia Italian. Romaio. Weish, 2

In 1843—44 (succeeding General John A. Dix) he was the editor of The Northern Light. Perhaps it would be correct to say that his rank among American poets is the same as that generally assigned to Dryden among English poets,—one of the first of the second class. As a descriptive poet, Dr. Grizwold (Poets and Poetry, &c.) doubted if he had a superior in America. Poe. (Marginalta, exxiv...) whilst remarking that "as a descriptive poet Mr. Street is to be highly commended." complains that endmended," complains that "he appears, however, not at any time to have been aware that mere description is not poetry at all."

For the copyright of The Que Mics Strickland was paid £2000: it was sold in May, 1857, for £6900. (see Lon. Pub. Circ., June 1, 1857, 229.) She has since repurchased this, and a number of copy-rights of her works. We have before us many com-mendatory notices of this important publication: M. mendatory notices of this important publication: M. Guizot pronounces it "a charming work,—full of interest, at once serious and pleasing;" and the London Times declares it to possess "the fascination of a romance united to the integrity of history." On the other hand, portions of it have been censured as untilly landatory of the Stuarts and unjustly abusive of their opponents. Edinburgh Reviewer remarks,

Edinburgh Reviewer remarks,

"It is with the tone of Mi-s Strickland's observations upon individual character that we flink we have a right to find fault. There is scarcely a conspicuous defender of her principles upon whose faults she has had the courage to do justice, nor a leader of the opposite party to whose merits she has had the generosity to give due honour. . . . We need not point out how entirely such faults as those which we have thus briefly noticed must deprive the work in which they occur of all real historical value."—April, 1849, 437, 431: Miss Strickland's Queens of Bugland: "April, 1849, 437, 431: Miss Strickland's Queens of Bugland: "April, 1849, 437, 431: Miss Strickland's Queens of Bugland: "The writings of this lady," comments the Quarterly Reviewer," notwithstanding a pervading poverty of style and an equally pervading feebleness of thought, and morgithalanding the graver faults of frequent inaccuracy and aimost constant partiality, are by no means without their usa. . . . If not always a safe guide herself, she is at least useful as directing the reader to better and more trustworthy antidrities."—July, 1851, art., wii.: Lices of the Quellis of England, dc.

"Mins Strickland's interesting volumes are particularly valuable to the historian for the copious entracts which they contain from enrious unpublished documents which they contain from enrious unpublished documents which have apped the action of writers too exclusively occupied with political events to give much head to details of a domestic and personal mature."

"Buart, Gilbert, LL.D., the son of George Stuart, Professor of Humanity in the University of Ediaburgh, was b. at Edinburgh, 1742; d. at his father's house at Musselburgh, 1786. He has already been noticed, not much to his honour, in our article on Henny, Rossent, (p. 826, supray) and more than most readers will care to know about such a sot, grumbler, sould, and literary Ishmaelite will be found in the authorities cited below. Of his grumbling and soulding here is a okolee specimen: Of his grumbling and scolding here is a choice specimen:

"It is my constant fate to be disappointed in every thing I themptr I do not think I ever had a wish that was gratified; at sever drauded an event that did not come. . dren of it. . . The publication is too good for the country. Letter, June 17, 1774.

The last sentence enables us to interpret the objurgation which precedes it. The "too good publication" was the violently abusive Edinburgh Magnaine and Review, (see SMELLIE, WILLIAM,) which with a moderate share of SHELLIM, WILLIAM,) which with a moderate share of decency might have succeeded very well. How he werried poor Dr. Henry we have already shown; the buffer stacked Dr. Robertson (in Nos. 5 and 7, infra) will be seen by a reference to Lord Brougham's Life of that great historian, (Men of Letters of the Time of theorge. III., ed. 1855, 274-77,) and other authorities; (infra.) Staart's complaint that he never "had a wish that was gratified" was, unfortunately, ill grounded; his "wish", for strong potations was "gratified" so often that his. for strong potations was "gratified" so often that his bodily powers sunk under the unequal conflict. This prominent member of the genus irritabile (see p. 175, supra) possessed abilities which under happior auspless would live greatly benefited the world,—which under unhappy auspices produced works of ne inconsiderable value. "Buses Bitair had the sagacity to discover the value of the faith. He had a yet greater medit,—he had the moral courage to assed up in defence of the literature he prized. The apparently irresistible evidence of the reality and value of his discoveries did not reduces all prejudice at once,—for the irresignificant as is well known, always has a serious fine when it encounters the treassables. Things have greatly changed since then. Many of the class of men of which we speak are as ignorant as ever, but they have the grace as longer to long to it,"—C P. Kradyes, J.D.D.: Lutherm, &v., Ot. 18, 1802.

EDWARDS A. PARK, D.D.: Faneral Sermon on Professor Stuars.

"Mr. Stuart's vocation was to call back the Bible, the gamine, original Bible, in its true interpretation, into the Theology of the Anglé Saxum. This great work he did,—nobly and effectively accomplished it; and it was task enough for any one man."—Carviv Stowr, D.D., Sept. 1, 1854: "Sprague's Annelle, at supre.

"The first chirat terratic of Professor Stuart as a commentator is the exhaustive thoroughness of his labors. He leaves no question with regard to the external history of the book under treatment without full discussion; makes a fair statement of all tenable theories; enters into the derivation, affinities, and assignable anguifications of every important word; and inserts or appends dissertations, or, as he profess to call thom, excurrate, on every point of difficult derivation and on the hearings of every satient phase of doctrine and opinion. He is also untrammelled by traditions, and never shrinks from awowing his honset being when it departs from the standard of critical orthodicay or diminishes the weight of argument for his own theological dogmass. His exp gase is in general skilful and felletious, especially in bringing out the meaning of obscure passages and adding new and delucate shades of thought to the obvious and more superficial serve; but it is sometimes too refined and subtile, attaching to a word or sentence a signification which presupposes in the author a philological taste kinds of to his own. His style has some maked faults, and perhaps no distinctive excellence. He is proliz, is fond of unusual and learned words, and mingles too freely with his English diction words and phraves from the Lairn and Greek."—A. P. Panopy, D.D.: N. Amer. Rec., April, 1862, 500.

Affred Sucking, Lon., r. 8vo. 1836.

"As a writer, Sir John Suckling will command admiration so long as a taste for whatever is dedicate and natural in poetry shall remain. His works are the production of a genius traity poetic and original; his language is animeted and foredde; his versification, for the age, smooth and flowing; the Structure of his stanzas is simple, and or asionally novel,—founded agestently, in some instances, on Italian models. In descriptions of feminine grace and beauty lie is pseudiarly happy, and in his press compositions is clear, nervous, and sparkling.
"If we bring his poems to the test of comparison with susceeding writers, notwithstanding the contibused progress of elegant literature since his day, he result will prove that in the lighter species of poetry he remains unrivalled. Had his name been unknown in any other department of literature, or unsecompanied with any historical associations, his ballads and songs alone would render his firms importabable. In his pross compositions Suckling has been equally admired; his intern are full of wit, spirit, and gallantry, and have been rarely surpassed. His 'Account of Religion by Beason' and his letters to Mr. Jernyn prove's his shilly to reason with closeness and compose with nervous elegance."—Extracts from the Editor's Propuse.

Swift, Jonathan, D.D., November 30, 1667-October 19, 1715, a descendant of an ancient Yorkshire family, was the grandson of the Rev. Thomas Swift, Vicar of thoodrich, Herefordshire, (husband of Elizabeth Dryden, aunt of Dryden the poet.) and the son of Jonathan. Swift, Steward of the King's Inns, Dublin, "that renowned city, nowned city," remarks our author, "where (absit invidia) I had the henour to draw my first breath;" an event

I had the honour to draw my first breath:" an event which occurred seven months after his father's death.
"As to my native country," writes Swift, on another occasion,
"I happened, indeed, by a perfect accident to be born here, my mother being left here from returning to her house at Leicenter; and I was a year old before I was sont to Sngland; and thus I am a Tengue, or an Irishman, or what people please, although the best part of my life was in England."—Letter to Mr. Grant, March 23, 1733-4: Soft's Norff, xviii. 203.

It will be observed that this statement is not altogether candid. With what propriety a birth in a place of permanent family residence is called, in Swift's souse, "a perfect accident," it is difficult to determine. Nor does the Dean speak more truly when he alleges that he was sent to England when a year old." He was stolen to England by his too affectionate nurse, who returned to her home at Whitehaven, by request of a dying relative, bearing with her a charge too precious to be left behind. Rather than permit the shild to run the hazard of a second voyage, the mother consented to let him remain where he was for nearly three years, after which period he was restored to her in Dublin. But we are sorry to say that this was not the only fiction of which the unwilling Irishman was guilty upon this to him unwelcome witting triangular was gainly aposition.

"Dr. Swift," remarks one of his most intimate and valued friends, "has told me that he was born in the town of beforeder, and that his father was minister of a parish in Herofordehire,"—Popr: Spence, Singer's ed., 1820, 161.

When dissatisfied with Ireland, he would often exclain, "I am not of this vile country; I am an Englishman." Yet at times he was known to point out the very house (No. 7 Houy's Court) in Dublin where he first drew breath. But he certainly did not consider that this "perfect accident" deprived him of the right to call himself an Englishman.

"I may observe," says a late eminent historian, "that, to the best of my belief, Swift nevery in any thing that he wrote, used the word frishman to denote a person of Angle-Baxon ruce born in Ireland. He no more considered himself as an Irishman, than an Englishman born at Calcutta considers himself as a Rindoo,"—Loran Macaular: "Rist, of England, ill. ch. xvii., n.
At six years of age Swift was placed at school at Kit-kenny, and on the 24th of April, 1682, was received as pensioner of Trinity College, Dublin, where he probably had a scholarship, as he remained there until 4685, when, on the breaking out of the Rabellion, he emigrated to Leiceater, where his mother had for some years lived on when, on the breaking out of the kebellion, he emigrated to Leiceater, where his mother had for some years lived out the charity of her English relations. In Ireland, after the death of her husband, her family (Swift, and a daughter, a little older than himself,—afterwards Mrs Feuton,—were her only children) had been dependent upon her two brothers in law, Godwin and William Swift, both settled in that country. At solings Swift differentiated himself it had been dependent to the country of the co Swit, took settled in that country. At solinge Switt distinguished himself indeed, but it was by the contempt of rules, defiance of authorities, neglect of studies, and the consequent penalties and consumes with which these grave offences were visited. It was only specially gratin that, Pebruary, 15, 1685, he received the degree of Bachelor of Arts.

Among the English relations of his mother was the wife of Sir William Temple; and in a few months after Swift's arrival in Leisester this connection led to the reception of the youth in the great man's family, in the capacity of secretary to the retired statesman. Here, for the first two years at least, his position was not the polition and to letters.—a genius destined to shake great leingdonn, to stir the laughter and the rage of millions, and to leave imaguage. Little did he think that she firitation in his servant;

a jest, was the beginning of a long unproponeous love which was to be as widely fained as the passion of Petrarch or of Abilard. Sir William's secretary was Jonathan Swift, Lady Giffard's watting-maid was poor Stella,"—Lonn Mcatury: Lifeard Writings of Sir William's secretary was Jonathan Swift, Laty

"His spirit had been howed down, and might seem to have been broken, by calamities and humiliations. The language which he was in the habit of hulding to his patron, as far as we can judge from the specimens which still remain, was that of a lackey, or rather of a begger. [Note: See Swift's Letter to Temple of Oct, 6, 1965.] A sharp word or a cold look of the

"It was at Shene and at Moor Park, with a salary of twenty points and a dinner at the upper servants' table, that this great and lenely Swift peased a ten years' apprent estip—more a casacch that was only not a lively—bent down a knee as proud as Lawler's to supplicate my lady's good graces or run on his bonout's errands. It was here, as he was writing at Temple's table, or following his patron's walk, that he saw and heard the men who had governed the great world,—measured himself with them, hooking up from his allent cover, gauged their brains, weighed their wits, turned them, and tried them, and marked them. Ah, what platitudes he must have heard! what feeble Jokes' what pompous commonplaces! what small men they must have seemed, under those snormous perwige, to the swarthy, succouth, slient Irish accretary. I wonder whether it swor struck temple that that frishman was his maste! I sup-pose that dismal conviction did not present itself under the ambrusial wig, or Tample could never have lived with Swift Swift stekened, rebelled, left the acrice, ate humble pic and same back again; and so for ten years went on gatheting lean-ling, swallowing scorn, and submitting with a stealthy rage to his fortune."—The scream regists Humouruts of the Enghteenth Chalary: a Series of Lectures: Notifi.

See, also, his Lecture on Charity and Humour, appended to N. York ed of his Lectures. We have allowed this lively reconteur to anticipate the regular course of our parrative. Installed as scoretary, Swift devoted himself to study, and soon acquired a large stock of historical information and some knowledge of the Greek and Latin

After about two years' residence with Sir William, he made a short visit to Ireland for the benefit of his health: "a surfeit of stone-fruit" (such is his explanation) had resulted in attacks of giddiness and other disorders, from which he suffered, more or less, to the end of his days.

On his return to Moor Park he was pleased to find himself treated with more consideration by a patron who had been taught the value of his company by its temporary deprivation. King William's Condense for Tem-ple's society brought him frequently to the Park, and he took enough notice of the scribe to arouse ambitious hopes which the monarch never took the pains to gratify. He, however, taught the secretary how to cut and eat asparagus (of which the sovereign seems to have been as fond as he was of "green peas") in the Dutch man-mer, a lesson which the Dean, in more prosperous days, was not unwilling to rehearse for the benefit of his ottinstructed gueste, -and offered him the captaincy of a troop of horse,—an honour which was not accepted.

After Swift had taken orders, William promised Temple that the divine should have a probend of Canterbury or After Swift had taken orders, whilm promised Lemple that the divine should have a probend of Canterbury or Westminster; but with the death of the patron died all the monarch's interest in the dependant.

In 1692 Swift ontered himself of Hart Hall, Oxford, for the purpose of taking his degree of M.A., which he received on July 4th of that year. Shortly afterwards his left Sir William's roof, after a cold parting from that gentleman; October 13, 1694, he was admitted to deason's orders; January 3, 1695, he took priest's criders; and the probess of Rirout, in the diocese of Councy, Ireland, bestowed by Lord Capel, enabled him he enter upon the dulies of the Pastorate. In the same year, (1695,) however, at the request of Temple, he again took up his residence at moor Park, and there remained until the death of the farmer, January 27, 1698. He left his companion a leggery and any profit which might arise from the publication of his post-humous works,—which Swift gave to the world, London, 1796-3, 2 wise Swo. We have not yet, however, done with Moor Park; it was here during his second term of residence) that he contracted an intimacy which exercised a powerful influence upon the future lives of himself, the object of his attentions, and a later admirer of his shining parts. Miss Esther Johnson, better known as Srella, resided with her mother, a companion of Lady Giffard, (Sir William Temple's sister.) at Moor Park. The secretary (he was in 1695 about thirty, his pupil thirteen) directed her studies, and soon taught her the art to love. Her future history will be found detailed at length by the biographers of Swift. Suffice it here to say that, after many years of painful experience of the peculiarities of her strange lover, she died in Dublin. January 22, 1792. experience of the peculiarities of mer strange forer, and died in Dubliu, January 28, 1728. It has been generally supposed that she was privately married to Swift in 1716, in the garden of the deanery, by the Bishop of Clogher. Yet in her will, drawn up as late as December, 1727, she describes herself as Esther Johnson, spinster. Now that describes herself as Esther Johnson, spinster. Now that we have entered upon the history of Swift's loves, let us dispatch the subject in a few words.

Varing, a predecessor of Stella's, was the title by which Swift designated Miss Jane Warying, who first declined his proposals, and then herself made overtures which were received in a style which at once closed all nego-tiations between the parties. Vanessa was the poetical name of Miss Esther Vanhourigh, who about 1712, being between eighteen and twenty, fell desperately in love with Swift, then not much less than forty-five. How both the ladies, Stella and Vanesse, followed Swift to Ireland, how both suffered from the pangs of jealousy and the crooked dealing of the unworthy lover, and how intal was the fruit of that knowledge so anxiously desired by the unhappy Vanessa,—all these and other details have been graphically sketched by Sir Walter Scott in his Life of Switt. We give a brief quotation:

details have been graphically sketched by Sir Walter Scott in his Life of Switt. We give a brief quotation:

"Miss Vanhamigh . . . determined on bringing to a crisis those expectations of a union with the object of her affections, to the hope of which she had cling annul every vicisatude of the conduct towards her. The most probable ban was his undefined connection with Mrs. Johnson, which, as it must have been perfectly known to her, had, doubtless, long excited her secret jedonsy. . . At length, however, Vanesa's impatience prevailed, and she ventured on the decaive step of writing to Mis. Johnson herself, requesting to know the nature of that connection. Stella, in reply, informed her of her marriage with the hean, and, full of the highest resentment against Swiff for highest implied, she sent to him her rival's letter of interiogation, and, without seeing him, or awaiting his reply, retired to the house of Mr. boid, near Diblin. Evry reader knows the consequence. Swift, in one of those paroxyams of furly to which he was luble, both from temper and disease, rode instantly to Mirley Abbey. As he entered the apartment, the steenmens of his countenance, which was peculiarly formed to express the force passions, stink the unfortunate Vanesas with such terror that she could scarce ask whether he would sit down. He answered by finging a letter on the table, and, instantly leaving the house, mounted his horse, and returned to Dublin. When Vanesa opened the packet, she only found her own letter to Stella. It was her death-warrant. She sunk at once under the disappointment of the delayed yet cherished hopes which had so long it keemed her heart, and beneath the unrestrained wrath of him for whose sake she had indulged them. How long she aurived the his hat interview is micretain; but the time does not seem to have exceeded a few weeks."—Section v.

seem to have exceeded a few weeks. —section v.
(See the poem of Cadenus and Vanessa, and the Correspondence of Swift and Vanessa, in Swift's Works.)

This occurred in 1722, when the reverend Lothard had attained the mature age of fifty-four. Vanessa, who had resided in Ireland since 1714, was about twenty-nine; Stella, who had followed Swift to Ireland about 1700, and since then had made it her home, was now about forty. We return to our chronological summary of Swift's ecclestastical, political, and literary biography. In the next year (1999) after the death of Temple he accompanied Lord Berkeley to Ireland as chaplain, acting for a time Lord Berkeley to Irriand as chaptain, acting for a time as private socretary; in the same year he received from his lordship, in place of the deanery of Derry, which he had promised him, the rectory of Agher and the vicar-ages of Laracof (about twenty miles from Dublin) and Rathbeggan, in the diocese of Meath; to which was added in 1700 the prehend of Dunlavin: in 1701 he published his first political tract, A Discourse on the Contests and Dissentions between the Nobles and Commons at Athens Discentions between the Nobles and Commons at Athens and Rome, Lon., 4to, (and this raised him to a promisent place among the leaders of the Whige;) in 1704 appeared the Tale of a Tub, (see Swipt; Thomas,) together with The Battle of the Rocks, (see Berrilly, Richaud, D.D., p. 170, supra;) in 1705 he made an unsuccessful application for the remission of the First-Fraits for Ireland; in 1708 he published The Sentiments of a Church of England Man, an attack upon astrology, (represented by Partridge, the Almanno-maker,) under the name of Indae Biokerstad un Argument against Abolishing. Christi-Disacressas an Argument agenus avertuating during anity, and A Letter on [in defence of] the Sacramontal Test; in 1709, A Project for the Advancement of Religion, ("the only work to which he aver put his name,") a Vindication of Bickerstaff, and an explanation of an Ancient Prophecy; in 1710 he again vielted England, to obtain a remission of the First-Fruits and Twentieth Parts; determined to join the Tories, and was introduced to Harley and St. John; in a short time gained the remission which he had solicited for the Irish clergy; conducted The Ex-aminer (a weekly periodical, started by St. John, Prior, and others, in support of the new ministry) from November 10, 1710, (No. 14) to June 14, 1711, (No. 45) formed the Tory Society of Brothers, of which he was the most active member: published, November 27, 1711, The Conduct of the Allies. *Scott's Life of Swift.

Scott's Life of Swift,

In concluding this sad story, it may be thought proper for us to join with those who, pointing the finger of ad-monition at the cage of the wretched manlac, exclaim, monition at the cage of the wretched maniac, exclain, "Behold an awful monument of the retributive justice of Almighty God!" But we have no heart for such censorship: we have not so "learned Christ." Remembering that those "whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices," and that the eighteen upon whom the tower of Silonin fell, were not proved by their greater calamities to be greater sinners than "all men that dwelt in Jerusalem," we presume not to "deal God's judgments round the world on all we deem his foes;" and we have that the recogning monopolemity with pureslyest we hesitate to pronounce nonconformity with ourselves enmity against God.

We concur with those biographers of Swift who con-demn many points of his character; but we are by no means sure that either of these, if placed in like circumstances and likewise constituted, would have behaved any better.

His treatment of the three women whose names will he forever associated with his own has been greatly, perhaps justly, censured; but can nothing be said, and honestly said, in his defence?

Varina:-he certainly discouraged her late repent ance; but is every postponed suitor obliged to kindle into fresh raptures whensoever it pleases the lady to change her mind?

Stellar—he was unwilling to live in matrimonial rela-tions with her. May not the "fearful looking for" of madness which terrified his later years have long before held him in bondage, and thus constituted that a virtue which has been adjudged a crime? What meant Swift when, then apparently in the prime of his powers, he femarked of Lord Allen, "I know that he is a madman s and, if that were all, no man living could commiscente his condition more than myself"? More than twenty years before his death, he exclaimed prophetically to Dr. Young, "Igeball be like that tree: I shallulie at the top."

Youfig, "Igeball be like that tree: I shalladie at the top."

What was the mystery referred to in the following sad chapter of a bridegroom's history?

"demediately subsequent to the ceremony (the private marriage of Swift and Radie] Swift's state of stind appears to have been dreadful. Dehny, (as I have learned from a friend of his relist,) being present to give his opinion on this strangs union, and that, atout the time it took plage, he observed Swift to be extremely gloomy and agitated; so much so that he west to Archibishop King to mention his apprehensione. On entering the library, Swift rushed out with a coustenance of distraction, and passed him without speaking. He found the archibishop in tears, and upon sating the recupe he said, "You have jest met the most unhappy man on earth; but on the subject of his wretchedness you must never ask a question." Swift seeinded himself from society for some days. When he respectively interested was resumed, with the same generated and caustoms attention to prevent the slightest supicion of a more intimate anion with the former; as II such intimacy had set now bean legal and virture. Stella, therefore, construct a stellar legal and virture.

and intimate friend of Swift, the regulatur of his household on gubble days, although she only appeared there as an ordinary guest; the consumition of his social hours, and his comforter to alchness; but his wife only in mathe, and aren that nominal union a secret from the world."—San Walten Scott: Life of Swift, sect v.

We do not dwell upon Delany's supposition that Swift's unhappiness arose from his knowledge that Stella and himself were, by different mothers, the children of Sir Walliam Temple, because we concar with Scott in deeming this hypothesis untenable.

Vanessa:—it was undoubtedly very wrong for Swift to frequent her scotely after a designation of love which he could not honestly encurrence but the temptative. to frequent her society after a declaration of love which he could not honestly encourage, but the temptation was great. Swift was but a man,—a courted, petted, spoiled man,—delighted by and delighting in the exercise of social fascinations of no common order; and it is surely something in his favour that (rather late in the day, perhaps) he so streamously and sincercly strove to discourage that "inexpressible passion for him which Vanessa declared it was not in the power of time or accident to leasen." "though," complains she, "you enden your by superities to force me from you." How many of Swift's consors would has a visited the fair Vanessa with vour by severities to force me from you." How many of Swift's consors would have visited the fair Vancesa with the "severities" which they lavish on the Dean? Let us temper judgment with meroy; and we think that "the quality of" our "meroy is not strained" Committing these suggestions—for they are not offered as vindications—to the consideration of the candid reader, we proceed to adduce the opinions of a number of unincut authorities on

He was never known to laught, and his smiles are happily characterized by the well-known lines of Shake speare. Indeed, the shole description of Cassius might be applied to Swift. His manners were, in his better days, free lively, and dingaging, not devoid of peculiarities, but liending them so well to rircumstances that his company was universally courted. He often exhibited in his first address a sterniess and bluntness of deneshour which, detached from the mole in which he well knew how to repair the pain he had given, was harsh to his inferiors and unevil to those of higher rank. An ancedete which, though told by Mrs. Philagdon, is well attested, bears, that the last time he was in Loudon he went to dine with the Earl of Burlingison, who was then but newly married. The earl, being willing, it is supposed, to have some diversion did not introduce him to his lady, nor an intion his nine. After dinner, said the Bosh. Lady Buillington, I hear you can sing, sing me a song? The lady looked on this mory monous manner of asking a favour with distaste, and positively reinsed. He said 'She should sing, or he would make her. Why, in idam, I suppose you take me for one of your poor. English hedge parsons. Sing when I bid you.' As the earl did nothing but laugh at this freedom the lady was so vexed that who have the outset, and ictired. SWIFT'S CHARACTER ASAN AUTHOR,

Swift's Character as an Author.

"In his works he has given very different specimens both of sentiments and expressions. His Tale of a Tub has little ry semiglance to his other pieces. It exhibits a Yebemence of rapidity of mind, a copiousness of images, and vivacity of diegonate has afterwards never possessed or mysar exerted. It is not have a such as he afterwards never possessed or mysar exerted. It is of a mode so distinct and poculiar that it must be considered by itself; what is true of that, is not true of any thing class which he has written. . . ["Wist a genius I had when I write that book!"—Swift, in old age.] In his other works is found gate oquable tenor of easy large way, which rather trickles than flows. His delight was in also gate. That he has in his works as mestaphor, as halffer, to by it a not true; but his few metaphors.

saves to be received rather by necessity than choice. . . He style was well suited to be thoughts, which are never subtilised by side disquestions, decorated by sparking concein, elevated by ambitious sentences, or variespand by sur-accept item may. It the postical works of Dr. Swill there is not such upon which the critic can exercise he howers. They are not such upon a timest always light, and have the qualities which recommend such compositions,—estimes and gaysty. They are, for the most part, what their author intended. The diction is correct, the surphers are smooth, and the rhyses exact. There seldom occurs a hard-laboured expression, or a redundant epithet, will his verses exemptify his own definition of a good style—thay consist of proper words in proper places "—DR JOHNSON Left of Swife, in Cunningham's ad of Johnson's Lave of the English Poets, 1844, in Luy, 181, 192 y v (intex) for the editor's illustrative Notes. editor's lituatrative Notes. See, also, Groker's Boswell's Johnsen, Index.

"As an Author, there are three peculiarities remarkable in the character of Swift. The Swift of these has been rankly concoded to an author, at least by his contemporaries. It is the distinguished attribute of Onyginality, and it cannot be retused to Swith by the most savare critic. Even Johnson has allowed that perhaps no nather can be found who has borrowed so little, or has so well amantained his claim to be considered as original. There was indeed nothing written before his time which could serve for his medel, and the few hints which he has adopted from other authors bear no more reweablance to his compositions than the groon flax to the cable which is formed from it.

The according reculiarity, which has indiced been shready noticed, is his total indifference to literary fame. Swift excepted his virious and numerous works has a carpenter forms wedges, malifer, or other implements of his art, not with the purpose of distinguishing himself by the workmanthip bettowed on the tools the malifers, but solely in order to render them fit for accomplishing a certain purpose, by yond which they wore of no varie in his eyes. . . The earletes mode in which Swift suffered his works to get to the public, his refusing them the credit of his name, and his renouncing all councetton with the profits of iterature, indicate his alkadan of the character of a professional author.

"The third distinguishing mark of Swift's literary character."

That part of Dean Swiff's satire [Gulliver's Travels] which relates to the Swiddbugs may possibly occur to some renders as bearing upon this topic. That the staunch admires of that singularly-gifted person should have been flung into extraces on the perusual of this extraordinary part of his writings, need not surprise us. Their captures were full easily extract but I am quite clear they have given a wrong gloss to it, and heaped upon its merits a very underserved passe. They think that the pretare of the fit uidib ugs was intended to wean us from a love of life, and that it has well accomplished us purpose. I am very certain that the dean never had any such thing in view, because his sage sit was far too great not to perceive that he only could make out this position by a most undisquired begging of the except of the fit of the same of the most ordinary reflection expect to wean his follow creatures from love of life by describing a sort of persons who at a given age lost that is faculties and became doting, direct life globally. Did any man breathing ever protend that he weshed to live, not only four capturies, but even for therefore years and ten, bereaved of his understanding, and treated by the law and by his fellow me as in hopeless insurable datage? The passage in question is understanding and treated by the law and by his fellow me as in hopeless insurable datage? The passage is question is made nore likely to have proceeded from Swift's exaggerated meanthropy, and to have been designed as on antidate to human prode, it is not rather to be regarded as the work of mere whim and captice "—Losd Manuellaki.
